Dies of Heart Attack As She Bids Friend Good-bye

Fatally stricken while bidding a friend good-bye, Mrs. Margaret R. Smith fell to the floor dead, last evening, just inside the front door of her Wilson street home.

Miss Marian Priestley had called at the Smith residence, planning to accompany Mrs. Smith to the polls for the purpose of voting. Mrs. Smith stated she did not think she would go. "The only one I would vote for would be Howard James, and he'll win anyway," she informed Miss Priestley.

Reaching the porch, Miss Priestley bid Mrs. Smith good-bye as the latter stood just within the door-way. Suddenly Mrs. Smith, who is 72 years of age, fell to the floor, a victim of a heart attack. She had not complained of feeling ill.

Mrs. Smith, widow of Charles H. Smith, was a member of St. James' Episcopal Church. Adam Smith, a nephew, survives.

The Rev. George E. Roswell, rector of St. James' Episcopal Church, will officiate at the service at the Molden funeral chapel, 133 Otter street, Friday at two p. m. Burial will be in Bristol Cemetery; and friends may call Thursday evening.

THE NOCTOVISOR

Man as well as cats can see at night now, thanks to an amazing new invention, the "noctovisor," which, for visual purposes, turns night into day.

An application of the invention is being used by the British to detect planes through fog and darkness. Noctovision—vision in darkness—is managed through the use of the invisible infra-red ray which is transformed, by means of a modified television apparatus, into a visible ray. More simply explained, the apparatus is essentially a television transmitter and receiver mechanically coupled together and constructed to be sensitive to invisible infra-red rays instead of light.

The "noctovisor" appears, then, as a great new weapon of the Allied war machine. It should be possible to install the apparatus along England's coast or even to equip air-planes with noctovision devices. And in similar fashion, a naval battle between a fleet equipped with noctovision searchlights and one relying on the ordinary means of observation would, in the dark of night, be a one-sided affair.

With the aid of noctovision, all difficulties of fog, poor visibility and smoke screens disappear. The utility of such an invention for warfare is extensive. Yet it also holds out implications of great utilitarian benefits for peacetime occupations. The "noctovisor" is the invention of John L. Baird, British television inventor, who demonstrated noctovision for the first time to members of the Royal Institution in 1926. Since then it has been developed in secret. Now it is ready to be used on the battlefield. Later it will be devoted to peaceful pursuits.

WOMEN'S ARMY

Although women were used in clerical and telephone work in the First World War, and since that time have been recognized as an integral part of the armed forces, all efforts to establish a Women's Army Auxiliary Corps similar to the British corps were defeated until the WAAC bill was passed by Congress and signed by the President.

The act provides for a maximum of 150,000 volunteers between the ages of 21 and 45. They will receive the same pay and allowances as men in the Army. The first step will be the selection of twenty or thirty women from each corps area to attend an officers' training camp. It is not expected that the WAAC will begin its recruiting campaign before late in the summer.

To what extent the American plan will follow the British plan is not known, but certainly the sponsor of the project had the British experience in mind. If they carry out the British idea, the women will perform a wide range of duties around permanent Army camps, from scrubbing floors to clerical and technical jobs.

The leaders of the movement have assumed a heavy responsibility. They have gained the authority to experiment. They know that they will have to pioneer, that they will have to make an outstanding success of their work if they are to survive. Heretofore Americans have regarded war as a man's job. The WAAC must contend with that belief and prove its worth. American women certainly can do that if British women can.

Plan Demonstration of Twp. Defense Units

Of defense will give a short address on the work being done in the County. Other officials also will attend.

Admission tickets have been distributed to the air raid wardens and emergency police, who have been instructed to leave one in each home in their district. There will be no charge for admission.

Arrangements have been made to have the Bristol high school band play a number of selections during the program.

Aside from the patriotic angle the meeting will also be of value to those who attend in the way of instruction which may become useful at any time. It is for this reason that officials hope to have representation from each home in the Township.

The Council issues a plea to residents to take a neighbor or two so that use of much-needed gasoline will not be too great. It is suggested that each driver take five persons, thus cutting down the number of cars to be used.

Food Locker to Open Soon at Yardley Mill

The plant will be modern in every detail.

Conserving food by the method of quick freezing is relatively new, particularly in the eastern part of the county, and to date there are but two plants of this type in Bucks County, both in Doylestown. Quick freezing is so satisfactory, however, that every month hundreds of new patrons preserve their food in this way, and Bucks County plants report a long waiting list for lockers. The local Grange has been interested for a long time in starting a plant in Lower Bucks County, and the Yardley plant has its support.

Although the plant to date has been privately financed, shares or participating certificates may be had by the public, and arrangements have been worked out so that those participating in the ownership and profits may also rent lockers at a slightly reduced rate. Details about this may be had from Sidney Cadwallader, 12 South Main St., Doylestown.

So I became Rainier's secretary, and Miss Hobbs showed me the ropes. It had been flattery to call her a girl. She was thin, red-faced, middle-aged, and so worshipping of Rainier that no husband could hope to get more than a remnant of any emotion she was capable of; indeed, I felt that the chance of marriage was tempting her more because she feared it might be her last than because she was certain she wanted it. She hinted this much during our first meeting, "I almost feel I'm deserting him," she said, and the stress on "him" was revealing. Presently, showing me how she filed his correspondence, she added: "I'm so relieved he isn't going to have another lady secretary. I'd be afraid of some awful kind of person coming here and—perhaps—influencing him."

I said I didn't imagine Rainier was the type to be influenced by that kind of woman.

"Oh, but you never know what kind of a woman will influence a man."

SYNOPSIS

During the two minutes' silence on Armistice Day, Nov. 11, 1937, a conversation developed between two strangers aboard a railroad train speeding through England's midland. One told of a "partial loss of memory" as the result of a shell-shock in the first World War. The other (the narrator of this story) discussed memory and dreams with the prosperous looking veteran who confessed that "sometimes I have a feeling of being somebody else." He mentioned a mountain that he had seen from the train that morning. Just before reaching London, the veteran introduced himself as Charles Rainier, a member of Parliament and a business man, after the narrator said his name was Harrison; and they agreed to meet at the Swarth's Society dinner, Cambridge University, the following evening. Immediately after that affair, Rainier and others adjourned to Harrison's room for coffee. About 3 a. m. when the others had left, Rainier told Harrison certain details of his mysterious story, stressing his loss of memory for three years from the moment of that shell-burst near Arras in 1917 until "I found myself lying on a park bench in Liverpool." He said he then returned to the family home at Stourton. He assumed he had been in a prison camp because a dentist had discovered German fillings in his teeth.

CHAPTER FOUR

We were silent for a moment. I could hear the first stir of early morning traffic beginning along King's Parade. Rainier heard it too, and as at a signal rose to go. "A strange business, the war. The English told the Germans exactly where I was, so that the Germans could kill me. . . then the Germans did half kill me, patched me up, and saw that my teeth were properly cared for. . . after which the English gave me a medal for having displayed what they called 'conspicuous gallantry in the field.'" He fingered it on his lapel, adding: "I wear it at shows like this, along with the Most Noble Order of Something-or-Other which the Greeks gave me for arranging a loan on their current crop in 1928." He began putting on his overcoat, heedless of my assurance that there was no hurry and that I often sat up till dawn myself. "Please don't bother to see me out—I'll take a bath at my hotel and be in time for the first train."

On his way across the room he paused at my shelves of books and asked what trips I was taking.

"Economics. I took the first part of the History last year."

"Really? I did the same when I was here. But where does the psychology come in?"

"Oh, that's only a side line."

"I see. Made any plans for when you go down?"

"I'd like to be a journalist."

He nodded, shaking hands at the door. "Well, I've got a few contacts in Fleet Street. Write to me when you're ready for a job—I might be able to do something for you."

Early the following year I took a Ph.D. and began looking around for the post which, it seemed to me, ought to drop snugly into the lap of any bright young man who had written a two-hundred-page thesis on "The Influence of Voltaire on the English Laissez-Faire Economists." Cambridge had deemed this worthy of a doctorate; nobody in Fleet Street, however, held it worth a regular job. I had a very small private income and could therefore afford to cadge snippets of highbrow reviewing from some of the more illustrious and penurious weeklies, reckoning myself well-paid if the books themselves were expensive and could be sold for more cash to Mr. Reeves of the Strand; but the newspaper world at that time was full of journalists out of work through amalgamations, and the chance of getting on the staffs of any of the big dailies was not encouraging. Of course I remembered Rainier's offer, but apart from my reluctance to bother him, he was abroad—in South America on some financial business. But by the time he returned I had been disappointed often enough to feel I should take him at his word. He replied instantly to my note, asking me to lunch the next day.

Thus I made my first trip to Kenmore. "Near the World's End pub," Rainier used to say, and it was the fashion among certain guests to pretend it was at some actual world's end if not beyond it—the world in this super-sophisticated sense being that part of London within normal taxi range. I went by bus, which puts you down at the corner of the road with only a hundred yards or so to walk. I had no idea how notable, not to say notorious, those Kenmore lunches were; indeed, since the invitation had come so promptly, I had beguiled myself with visions of an intimate foursome composed of host and hostess with perhaps a press magnate summoned especially to meet me. I did not know then that Mrs. Rainier gave lunches for ten or twelve people two or three times a week, enclosing every temporary or permanent celebrity to meet other temporary or permanent celebrities at her house, and that these affairs were as frequently joked about as they were infrequently declined. She functioned, in fact, as a kind of liaison officer between Society and Bohemia, with a Maecenas glance at moneyless but personable young men; and though there is no kind of social service I would less willingly undertake myself, there are few that I respect more when competently performed by someone else.

Searching my memory for impressions of that first arrival, I find I cannot put Mrs. Rainier into the picture at all. She was there, she must have been; but she was so busy making introductions that she could not have given me more than a few words, and those completely unimportant. I came a little late and found myself ushered into a drawing room full of initiates, all talking with great gusto, and all—so it seemed to me (quite baselessly, of course)—resentful of intrusion by a stranger who had neither written a banned novel nor flown somewhere and back in an incredibly short time. I say this because one of the guests had written such a novel, and another had made such a flight, and it was my fate to be seated between them while they talked either to their outside neighbors or across me to each other. There was an empty place at the head of the table, and presently I gathered from general conversation that Rainier often arrived late and sometimes not at all, so that he was never on any account waited for. I had already written off the whole affair as a rather profitless bore when the guests rose, murmured hasty good-byes, and dashed out to waiting cars and taxis. (Mrs. Rainier's lunches were always like that—so-fifteen sharp to two-fifteen sharp and not too much to drink, so that you did not kill your afternoon.) Just as I was following the crowd, a touch on my arm accompanied the whisper: "Stay a moment if you aren't in a hurry."

Mrs. Rainier led me a few paces back along the hall after the others had gone. "I didn't quite catch your name—"

"Harrison."

"Oh yes. . . You're a friend of Charles's—it's too bad he couldn't get here—he's so busy nowadays."

I murmured something vague, polite, and intended to be reassuring.

"It's a pity people who can fly halfway round the world haven't any manners," she went on, and I answered: "Well, I suppose there are quite a number of people who have manners and couldn't fly halfway round the world."

"But having manners is so much more important," she countered. "Tell me . . . what . . . er . . . I mean, are you a . . . let me see . . . Harrison?"

I smiled—suddenly and rather incomprehensibly at ease with her. "You're trying to recall a Harrison who's written something, married somebody, or been somewhere," I said. "But it's a waste of time—I'm not that Harrison, even if he exists. I'm just—if I call myself anything—a journalist."

"Oh . . . then you must come again when we have really literary parties," she replied, with an eagerness I thought charming though probably insincere. I promised I would, with equal eagerness, and every intention of avoiding her really literary parties like the plague.

I shook hands, left the house, and on the bus back to Fleet Street suddenly realized that it had been a very good lunch from one point of view. I had never tasted better eggs Mornay.

The next afternoon Rainier telephoned, profuse in apologies for his absence from the lunch, and though the matter could hardly have been important to him, I thought I detected a note of sincerity. "I gather you didn't have a very good time," he said, and before I could reply went on: "I'm not keen on the mob, either, but Helen's a born hostess—almost as good as an American—she can take in twenty new names all in a row and never make a mistake."

"She didn't take in mine. In fact it was pretty clear she didn't know me from Adam."

"My fault, I expect. Must have forgotten to tell her."

"So a perfect stranger could walk into your house and get a free lunch?"

"They're doing that all the time—though most of 'em have invitations. . . Look here, if you're not busy just now, why not come over to the House for tea?"

I said I would, and took the bus again to Chelsea. But at Kenmore the maid told me that Rainier hadn't been in since morning and never by any chance took tea at home; and just then, while we were arguing on the doorstep (I insisting I had been invited less than twenty minutes ago), Mrs. Rainier came up behind me and began to laugh. "He meant the House of Commons," she said, passing into the hall. "You'd better let my car take you there."

Extraordinary how stupid one can be when one would prefer to impress by being knowledgeable. I knew quite well that the House of Commons, along with the Stock Exchange and Christchurch, Oxford, was called "the House," yet somehow, when Rainier had used the phrase over the telephone, I could only think of Kenmore. Most of the way to Westminster in the almost aggressively unostentatious Daimler (so impersonal you could believe it had been an undertaker's fleet), I cursed my mistake as a poor recommendation for any kind of job. I had feared Rainier might be waiting for me, and was relieved when, after sending in my name, I had to kill time for half an hour before a policeman led me through devious passages to the Terrace, where Rainier greeted me warmly. But his appearance was slightly disconcerting; there was a twinkle about his mouth and eyes as he spoke, and a general impression of intense nervous energy in desperate need of relaxation. During tea he talked about his South American trip, assuming far too modestly that I had read nothing about it in the papers. Presently the division bell rang and only as we hurried across the Smoke Room did he broach the matter I had really come about. "I inquired from a good many people after I got your letter, Harrison, but there doesn't seem to be a thing doing in Fleet Street just now."

"That was my own experience too."

"So I wondered if you'd care for a secretary's job until something else turns up?"

I hadn't really thought about such a thing, and maybe hesitation revealed my disappointment.

He said, patting my arm: "Well, think it over, anyway. I've had a girl up to now, but she's due to get married in a few weeks—time enough to show you the ropes. . . that is, of course, if you feel you'd like the job at all. . ."

So I became Rainier's secretary, and Miss Hobbs showed me the ropes. It had been flattery to call her a girl. She was thin, red-faced, middle-aged, and so worshipping of Rainier that no husband could hope to get more than a remnant of any emotion she was capable of; indeed, I felt that the chance of marriage was tempting her more because she feared it might be her last than because she was certain she wanted it. ## BUNNIES DEFEAT NEWTOWN IN EXTRA FRAME; MASSI SMASHES RESOUNDING TRIPLE TO CENTER FIELD

By Jack Gill

Art Massi, Bristol High School's third sacker, made it his personal business to see to it that his mates remained in the running for the lower division baseball title the other day.

His mates were floundering around like a pair of doves on the country estate against Newtown. Mindful of the fact that they were only one game ahead of Bensalem in the league standings seemed to bother them little. They lived three agonizing innings as the third placers zoomed into a 5-1 lead.

Then came the re-awakening. They tallied twice in the fourth on a single by Cialella and a double by Riebel at six all at the end of the seventh, the Bunnies won it in the extra frame.

Skamps Scancelli, who had three safe blows for the day, smashed a single into centerfield. He went to second on a passed ball and came home with the winning run when Massi broke up the fray with a resounding triple to center.

It was nice that Massi broke it up, too, for previous to his triple in the overtime canto he had smacked a single and a home run. It was by far his best day of his career. Scancelli also had three safe swats to make the bus trip home a happy one.

Joe Sagolla started on the mound for the locals and had one bad inning. Newtown tabbed five in the third on two walks, three hits and two errors. Jim Hopkins went in to hurl in the sixth and struck out three men.

Bristol remained one game ahead of Bensalem in the title chase. The two met at Bristol this Friday and a win by the Owls can knot the loop. A Bunny triumph would set it up for the local firemen.

CAPRIOTTI ADDS TO HIS ATHLETIC LAURELS

Armand Capriotti, Bristol high school's all-around athlete, added another feather to his cap of versatility last week when he tied for first place in the District 1 P. I. A. A. track meet held at Norristown.

"Cap," who last Fall led the Lower Bucks conference in individual scoring and who this Spring has been catching great ball as captain of the baseball team, remained unbeaten in the pole vault under the lights in the Norristown meet. Competing against the best class B men in the suburban district, his tie ward off defeat and kept his record intact.

Paul Ruby continued his fine work by placing third in the shot put and by picking up added points for the Bunnies in the high jump event.

Several other schools from Lower Bucks entered the first night track test in P. I. A. A. history, but failed to place. Langhorne's Johnny Miller, leading miler of the section, didn't have it in the stretch drive and finished seventh.

HUNTER TEAM WINS 3RD STRAIGHT GAME; DOWNS ST. ANN'S IX

Ammunition Makers Go Into Third Place In The League

FINAL SCORE 9 TO 2
St. Ann's Gave Sorrowful Exhibition of Ball
Playing

The Hunter team won its third straight game in the Bristol Suburban League last night as it downed the St. Ann's team, 9-2, on the latter's field. The triumph put the ammunition men in third place.

In losing, the St. Ann's nine gave a very sorrowful exhibition. It tossed away runs by some ragged base-running and then played poorly afield, committing three disastrous errors and allowing many balls to go for base hits that should have been fielded with ease.

And in addition to above, the starting hurler, Al Shearn, was too wild, walking three batters and hitting two with pitched balls in the two innings he pitched.

The winning combination made nine hits, while the St. Ann's team collected five. The Hunter boys put the game away in the fourth by scoring five times.
